After the experiments of Hauksbee in 1709, by which the knowledge of this mysterious substance was considerably advanced, Wheeler and Gray, who had discovered that 1 Wall s paper is in the Tramactions for 1708, Vol. XXVI. No. 314, p. 69.--Hauksbee on Electrical Light, in the same voltme. See Abridgment, Vol. V. p. 408, 411. one body could communicate electricity to another without rubbing, being willing to try to what distance the electrical virtue might be thus conveyed, employed, for the purpose of forming the communication, a hempen rope, which they extended to a considerable length, supporting it from the sides, by threads which, in order to prevent the dissipation of the electricity, they thought it proper to make as slender as possible. They employed silk threads with that view, and found the experiment to succeed.--Thinking that it would succeed still better, if the supports were made still more slender, they tried very fine metallic wire, and were surprised to find, that the hempen rope, thus supported, conveyed no electricity at all. It was, therefore, as being silk, and not as being small, that the threads had served to retain the electricity. This accident led to the great distinction of substances conducting, and not conducting electricity. An extensive field of inquiry...
