Excerpt: . least good. The vexation it caused helped to keep the subject working in Wilton s mind. Certain it was, that after returning from Monksleugh and writing two or three letters, he took advantage of a fine wintry afternoon to stroll leisurely to the brae before mentioned, and beyond it, to the piece of border ground between the Brosedale plantations and the road, where he had held his horse for Ella Rivers to sketch; but all was silent and deserted, so he returned to dress and drive over to D Castle. It was a pleasant party, and Wilton was a most agreeable addition. He felt at home and at ease with the Earl s kindly, well-bred daughters; and perhaps they would have been a little surprised, could they have read his thoughts, to find that he classed them as unaffected gentlewomen almost equal to the...
